WSP USA INSPECTION SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

January 6, 2025

Severe Weather Outlook Southeast

- A threat of strong storms will shift to the Southeast and parts of Florida on Monday.
- Rain and a few thunderstorms were ongoing from the western Carolinas down to the Florida Panhandle on Monday morning.
- It will continue to slide east through the day with more thunderstorms expected to develop along and out ahead of it.
- Damaging 60-plus-mph winds are the main threat, but a tornado cannot entirely be ruled out.
- When the storms reach Central Florida by the late-afternoon hours, a reduction in wind shear and instability in the atmosphere should end the threat of severe weather.

Snowstorm

- The first major winter storm of the year that stretched across the U.S. is continuing its deadly journey eastward.
- Cities in the mid-Atlantic, like Washington and Baltimore, experience significant impacts from heavy snow and ice.
- Its journey began across the nation after slamming the West Coast, where it spawned the first tornado of the year in California.
- Then moved into the Plains and Midwest over the weekend, where blizzard conditions were experienced at Kansas City.
- As of Monday morning, PowerOutage.US reported more than 300,000 outages across portions of Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, West Virginia and Virginia.
- Governors in several states, including Maryland, declared a state of emergency and warned residents to stay home if possible, to ensure safety due to the treacherous driving conditions on roads and highways across the region.
