Tropics Watch

- Conditions in the Atlantic basin remained quiet Tuesday, with forecasters watching one tropical wave in the eastern Caribbean Sea, according to the latest advisory from the National Hurricane Center.
- There's more activity in the eastern Pacific, which has already experienced Hurricanes Agatha and Blas. Tropical Depression Celia is forecast to become a tropical storm later today.
- Dry air, Saharan dust and strong winds — which tear apart developing tropical systems — have helped keep activity low since Potential Tropical Cyclone One crossed Florida June 3-4. It later strengthened into Tropical Storm Alex, the first named storm of the Atlantic hurricane season.
- But warm waters and a weak storm system called the Central American gyre make a tropical system in the Caribbean a possibility into early July, according to AccuWeather forecasters.
- One potential trouble spot could develop off the mid-Atlantic and southern Atlantic coasts of the U.S. this weekend.
- There is a remote chance that a non-tropical storm may linger over marginally warm waters long enough to take on some tropical characteristics. Any development in this area would be very slow.
- As wind shear decreases, it's also possible a tropical system could impact the southern U.S. by the end of June, according to AccuWeather.
- The next named storm of the 2022 Atlantic hurricane season will be Bonnie.
