WSP USA INSPECTION SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

March 25, 2025

Severe Weather Outlook Central & South U.S.

- The FOX Forecast Center is monitoring the potential for another multiday severe weather threat.
- The developing storm system is expected to move into the Plains by late Saturday and strengthen as it tracks off to the east during the overnight hours.
- By Sunday, the system will keep getting stronger and will likely bring the threat of severe weather across a large portion of the U.S. stretching from the Gulf Coast to the Ohio Valley and southern Great Lakes region.
- More than 40 million people will need to prepare for the possibility of strong to severe thunderstorms in major cities across the region.
- These cities include Birmingham in Alabama, Little Rock in Arkansas, Nashville and Memphis in Tennessee, St. Louis in Missouri and Indianapolis in Indiana.
- The forecast is still several days away, and the forecast will continue to be updated as we get closer to the weekend. However, it appears that the system will be capable of producing large hail, damaging wind gusts and tornadoes over a very large area of the nation.
- The threat will then shift to the East Coast from the Southeast to mid-Atlantic on Monday, putting about 28 million people on alert for possible severe weather in cities including Atlanta in Georgia and Charlotte and Raleigh in North Carolina.
- It's been an extremely active month when it comes to severe weather.
- So far, the FOX Forecast Center said there have been more than 2,000 severe weather reports this month, including more than 100 confirmed tornadoes during deadly severe weather outbreaks.
