Severe Weather Outlook South & Southeast

- The chances of a "significant severe weather threat" in the South next week are continuing to grow.
- The FOX Forecast Center is continuing to monitor two separate disturbances that are expected to move across the country.
- These disturbances could produce rounds of severe weather on Sunday, and then again Tuesday and Wednesday.
- At this time, the FOX Forecast Center said next week's severe weather threat looks to be more substantial than Sunday's risk.
- Sunday's severe storm threat will take shape as a weak disturbance pushes out of the Rockies and into the Plains.
- Forecasters say a dryline – a boundary separating a humid air mass from a much drier air mass – will develop and push through portions of Texas and Oklahoma, firing up thunderstorms as it does so.
- Some of those thunderstorms could turn severe and produce hail and damaging wind gusts.
- The FOX Forecast Center said another storm system will develop starting on Tuesday across portions of the South.
- More than 22 million people from East Texas into the lower and mid-Mississippi Valley will be at risk of severe weather on Tuesday.
- "As the confidence in the overall pattern increases, the confidence for a significant severe weather threat has also increased and 30% severe weather probabilities have been added from East Texas to central Mississippi," the SPC said.
- The threat will then shift to the Southeast and mid-Atlantic on Wednesday, but it's still too early to determine exactly what types of extreme weather are possible.
