WSP USA INSPECTION SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

Winter Storm Gail

- After several days of build-up, what promises to be the most significant winter storm in years was set to bear down on the East Coast early Wednesday.
- Snow was likely to fall all the way from Georgia to Massachusetts, which was expected to lead to very dangerous travel conditions and isolated power outages, the National Weather Service warned.
- "All the ingredients are now coming together for our snowstorm, and I really don't see a way out of this for many cities across the Northeast," AccuWeather meteorologist Bernie Rayno said late Tuesday.
- A wide swath of the region was forecast to see a foot of snowfall accumulation, with some spots potentially seeing up to two feet, the Weather Service said.
- In all, over 40 million people were under a winter storm warning.
- On Wednesday morning, parts of the Midwest were already seeing some light snow fall.
- According to the Weather Service, the storm will move into West Virginia, Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania later this morning then trek to the New York area and beyond in the evening.
- Forecasters also say that snow and ice will not be melting quickly as a cold plunge will follow the storm.
- "On the heels of the major winter storm that will bury much of the mid-Atlantic and portions of the Northeast with over a foot of snow, some exceptionally cold air for mid-December will linger later on Thursday, Thursday night and Friday," said AccuWeather Senior Meteorologist Carl Babinski.
- In fact, many areas will have temperatures as low or lower than what is typical in January, which is the coldest month of the year on average.
