Flood Threat

- More than 35 million people across a 1,000-mile swath of the U.S. stretching from Texas to the Carolinas are facing a renewed threat of flooding on Thursday.
- The bull's-eye for flooding covers parts of southeastern Texas and southwestern Louisiana, where two weather systems will combine to drench the region already hit hard by Hurricane Beryl, with rainfall rates of up to 3 inches or more per hour.
- The FOX Forecast Center said torrential rain was already falling Thursday morning and will continue into the afternoon, with the highest rainfall totals expected along the middle and upper Texas coasts, generally between Matagorda and Galveston bays.
- That's where rainfall totals of up to 3-5 inches could fall by the end of the week.
- Flood Watches and Flood Warnings have been issued across southeastern Texas, including the Houston metro, and will remain in effect through at least the rest of Thursday.
- Other cities under the Flood Watch include Rockport, Bay City and Port Arthur in Texas.
