Flooding Activity California

- The mayor of Redding, CA announced on Sunday that one person had died from life-threatening flooding impacting portions of Northern California.
- Evacuations and rescues are underway throughout the region.
- The activity began on Saturday as the next atmospheric river shifts south, positioning itself across Northern California.
- A strong area of low pressure moves into the Gulf of Alaska while high pressure over Southern California acts to funnel moisture from Hawaii, making this a classic "Pineapple Express."
- Officials have said that some areas could see a month's worth of rain, while others could see most of their yearly average in just a few short days.
- Flash flooding is expected from the Napa Valley north to Chico.
- A flash flood threat now exists for Northern California and the northern Sierra Nevada foothills.
- Widespread totals of 3 to 5 inches of rain are expected across Northern California.
- Higher totals are forecast for the northern Sierra Nevada foothills, where 5 to 8 inches are possible, with some isolated areas reaching up to 10 inches by Tuesday.
- From Tuesday night into Wednesday, a second round of flooding rain and powerful winds will move onshore in Northern California.
- This storm is expected to intensify as it moves inland, bringing wind gusts up to 80 mph to coastal areas and the potential for even more flooding, according to the FOX Forecast Center.
- Some forecast models indicate this system could become a bomb cyclone as it approaches the coast early Wednesday morning.
