WSP USA INSPECTION SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

January 16, 2025

Potential Snow

Eastern

- A series of frontal boundaries will help usher in the coldest air of the season, beginning over the weekend and continuing into the upcoming week.
- The upcoming storm systems aren't expected to be overly organized when they approach the eastern U.S., leading to light to occasionally moderate amounts of precipitation.
- Between the two storm systems, a maximum of 1-3 inches of snowfall is expected for parts of the Northeast. 1-3 inches of rainfall is expected in the warm zone over the Southeast.
- A brief respite from the cold air will allow most major cities to experience precipitation in liquid form this weekend, from Florida and Georgia through the I-95 corridor in the Northeast.
- Enough cold air will be in place for the secondary storm system to bring more widespread snowfall.
- Wraparound moisture in the mid-Atlantic could cause some travel disruptions in areas that don't typically see frozen precipitation, such as Virginia, North Carolina and the Delmarva Peninsula. The impact in these regions is expected to be relatively minor.
