Lake-Effect Snowstorm

New York

- Parts of New York finally caught a break Sunday after a storm spent days dumping a potentially record-setting amount of snow on cities and towns east of Lake Erie and Lake Ontario.
- Many businesses in the hardest-hit areas remained closed, but highways reopened, and travel bans in many areas were lifted, though bands of lake-effect snow were expected to bring up to 2 feet (0.6 meters) by Monday morning in some parts of the state that were largely spared in earlier rounds.
- "This has been an historic storm," New York Gov. Kathy Hochul said at a briefing on Sunday.
- As of Sunday afternoon, Hochul said there were about 1,200 power outages in the state, with about 300 in Jefferson County and about 100 in Erie County.
- Hochul is asking for a federal disaster declaration for the affected areas, which would potentially unlock some aid. She said teams were checking on residents of mobile home parks in areas that got enough snow to potentially crumple roofs.
- This month's storm is at least the worst in the state since November 2014, when some communities south of Buffalo were hit with 7 feet (2 meters) of snow over the course of three days, collapsing roofs and trapping drivers on a stretch of the New York State Thruway.
