WSP USA INSPECTION SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

Tropical Outlook

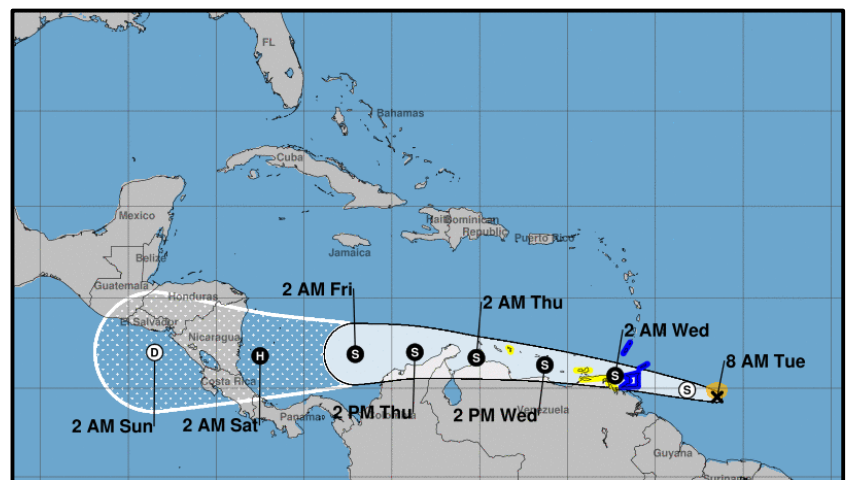

Atlantic Disturbance 1

- AccuWeather meteorologists are closely tracking a disturbance over the north-central Gulf of Mexico for potential tropical development into the middle of the week. Regardless of whether a system evolves, downpours that can produce flash flooding but also alleviate ongoing drought conditions are forecast.
- Residents along the Texas coastline should all be on alert for the potential of a quick-forming system.
- Even if a tropical system does not form, tropical downpours are likely across the Gulf Coast states this week.
- While portions of Texas and Louisiana could really use the rain, it's possible that the rainfall may come too quickly for the dry ground to absorb, resulting in flash flooding.
- Outside of this zone, across parts of Mississippi, Alabama and the Florida Panhandle, downpours are also expected; because this area has experienced closer-to-normal rainfall over the past several months, making flash flooding less likely.

Potential Tropical Cyclone 2

- Heavy rainfall is expected across the Windward Islands and northeaster Venezuela tonight through Wednesday. Localized flash flooding will be possible.
- Winds to tropical-storm-force are expected over portions of the southern Windward Islands tonight.
- Tropical storm conditions are possible along the northeastern coast of Venezuela tonight and Wednesday and on Bonaire by Wednesday evening.
- There is a higher-than-normal uncertainty on the system forecast intensity once it reaches the southwestern Caribbean Sea late Thursday and Friday, with will depend on how much it interacts with land from tonight through Thursday.
