Flood Activity Georgia

- Governor Brian Kemp will be traveling to North Georgia on Wednesday to tour the damage left behind by weekend floods.
- On Sunday, Kemp declared a state of emergency for Floyd and Chattooga counties after heavy rains dumped a massive amount of water in parts of those counties.
- Kemp will reportedly travel to Summerville on Wednesday, which appears to be the hardest hit area from the floods.
- Few, if any, who were impacted by weekend flooding in northwest Georgia have flood insurance.
- A flooded filtration plant in Chattooga County, Georgia, has knocked the city of Summerville's municipal water system offline for days, leaving city officials racing to restore water service as officials from all over the state begin to assess Sunday's flood damage.
- City water should be restored at the end of the week, Janice Galloway, Summerville city manager, said in a phone interview. That could be Friday or even Sunday, but she said she'll know more when a contractor visits the city's water treatment plant Wednesday.
- There were about 30 people working at the plant Tuesday afternoon to restore service to its 11,000 customers, Galloway said.
