WSP USA INSPECTION SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

Flash Flooding Pacific Northwest

- On the heels of a deadly Pineapple Express storm this week, a new atmospheric river storm looms for the weekend.
- Heavy rain will return to the region from late Friday into Saturday, adding more water to swollen rivers that have mostly returned to their banks after reaching moderate to even record flood levels on Tuesday and Wednesday but are still running high.
- There are still some lingering showers in the region on Thursday as floodwaters continue to recede. Lingering Flood Warnings remain in effect for a handful of rivers into Thursday afternoon across western Washington and western Oregon.
- After a break in the weather Friday, the next atmospheric river arrives in the Northwest on Saturday with steady moderate to heavy rain in the lowlands and increasing mountain snow.
- By Sunday, about another 0.5-2 inches of rain is likely in the Interstate 5 corridor in Washington and Oregon, with another 2-5 inches of rain expected along the coastal regions and their mountains.
- "Given saturated ground conditions and rivers/streams still running well above average, would expect some additional flooding impacts with this event," NOAA's Weather Prediction Center wrote while placing that area in a Level 2 out of 4 risk for flash flooding Saturday.
