WSP USA INSPECTION SERVICES DISASTER AWARENESS REPORT

March 16, 2022

Severe Weather Outlook

- A slow-moving weather system will unleash disruptive downpours and thunderstorms across Louisiana and to the Carolinas and Florida into the end of this week, and some of the storms could become severe, AccuWeather forecasters warn.
- The storms carry the potential to spawn isolated tornadoes and hail, with the first of the tornadoes coming Tuesday evening.
- Meteorologist Reed Timmer confirmed a tornado south of Monteverde, FL, at approximately 8:20 p.m. EST Tuesday, prompting the National Weather Service to issue a tornado warning for multiple cities in the west Orlando area.
- "The main threats from the storms will be from torrential downpours that can produce localized flash flooding, but there can be a small number of severe thunderstorms capable of producing a tornado or waterspout," AccuWeather Chief On-Air Meteorologist Bernie Rayno said.
- A general rainfall of 1-2 inches is forecast through Wednesday evening, but where downpours persist for a few hours or repeated storms hit, an AccuWeather Local StormMax™ of 6 inches is possible.
- On Thursday, there will be two separate areas at risk for heavy, gusty thunderstorms as the weather system progresses to the northeast. North Carolina and Virginia will be in the path of potentially damaging thunderstorms.
- The other thunderstorm zone may push southward over the Florida Peninsula Thursday.
- The same risks ranging from spotty flooding downpours to hail, gusty winds and perhaps an isolated tornado will continue in the Southeast.
