- A multiday severe weather outbreak has caused destruction across large swaths of the southern U.S., including near major metropolitan areas of Dallas-Fort Worth and New Orleans, as dozens of tornadoes were reported.
- As of Thursday afternoon, at least three people have died during this week's severe weather outbreak.
- Louisiana Gov. John Bel Edwards declared a state of emergency on Dec. 13 as a result of the severe weather and tornadoes.
- At least 43 tornadoes had been confirmed to have tracked across the south-central Plains and the South from Dec. 12 to Dec. 15 as of Thursday afternoon, though that number is expected to rise as survey reports are published.
- The NWS office in Dallas Fort Worth, which covers a large portion of North Texas, confirmed at least 14 tornadoes, consisting of three EF0 tornadoes, seven EF1 tornadoes and four EF2 tornadoes.
- One EF3 tornado was confirmed in this week's outbreak, which struck Tuesday in Union Parish with peak winds of 140 mph. The tornado tracked from Bayou D'Arbonne Lake to around the Farmerville area, which is about 105 miles northeast of Shreveport. At least 14 injuries were recorded.
- Tornadoes continued churning up in the state through Wednesday as the weather promoted rescue efforts in New Iberia, Louisiana, about 100 miles west of New Orleans, after the local police department confirmed at least two tornadoes had touched down in the area.
- Later that evening, farther east, a tornado that the NWS has rated as an EF2 tracking from Marrero to the New Orleans suburb of Arabi.
- Across state lines, a radar-indicated tornado struck the Mason Trailer Park community in Anguilla, Mississippi, located about 60 miles northwest of Jackson, destroying several mobile homes.
- The storms continued to rumble through the South into Thursday, though they focused on a much smaller area compared to the last few days.
